ON THE COVER

*Their design for the Oklahoma City National Memorial touched the hearts of a nation. This was not just another commission for architects Hans and Torrey Butzer but rather the monument that may well define their careers. When the job was finished, the University of Texas graduates decided to move their practice to Oklahoma, buying a home not far from the site, continuing to collaborate with the memorial foundation, and, in Hans' case, pursuing a life's ambition to include teaching as part of his mission to use architecture for the greater good. Story on Page 4.

4 TO TOUCH THE HUMAN SPIRIT

The Oklahoma City National Memorial brought international acclaim to its designers, Hans and Torrey Butzer. But Hans has a second calling that has taken him into OU's architecture classrooms.

10 NO QUICK FIX FOR ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE

OUHSC's Roger Brumback is cautiously optimistic about progress in Alzheimer's disease research, but in spite of the media hype, he doubts that discovering either the cause or the cure is imminent.

14 KEEPING HIS CHILDHOOD ALIVE

Alumnus Floyd Cooper's award-winning illustrations for children's books have an ethereal quality, like visiting a memory, bridging the gap between author and reader, between one generation and another.

20 THE ENGLISH PLACEMENT TEST FOR 1937

The duty of each faculty member was "to require that students shall be careful in the use of English," and should their charges prove to be language-deficient, to banish them to the ignominy of English 0.

24 CALLING DOCTOR COALE

The Sooner women's basketball team was on life support when a feisty, young coach with no college experience was employed to stem the bleeding and restore to health a program OU had pronounced dead.
