LITERATURE AND ITS PHILOSOPHY

he had thereby inaugurated was merely a peculiar, in his case, a scientific philosophy of life, a bias of his epoch.

Philosophy and literature are similar but not identical. The difference lies in their medium. The vehicle of philosophy is logical thought, the vehicle of literature is the word. The word as medium of art does not point beyond itself to "things" outside of itself, but carries an emotional, imaginative fringe, it challenges you to build up an unreal, a seeming world, in which you believe as if it were a real one. Thus it emancipates you from the cares and problems of your environment and permits you to see life steady and see it whole.

And even in this differentiating medium lies a similarity to philosophy. By virtue of its entirely symbolic medium, the word, literature ranges over the realm of all the other arts. In imagination you build and chisel and paint and sing. Literature is a synthetic and therefore the most philosophical of arts. Philosophy has an analogous mystic function with regard to special sciences, whose methods and presuppositions are philosophical problems. If what has been said is valid at all, the conclusion seems to be inevitable that we should have a philosophical interpretation of literature. This philosophical interpretation should have its place side by side with a material informatory, philological method and a literary, artistic, reproductive, intuitive method. The philosophical method would be to interpret art as the symbolic expression of evaluation, which constitutes the adventurous history of philosophies of life or what is the same thing, of cultural epochs. It would have to approach great works of literature with the respect due to genial individuals, whose message is an actual challenge and a question rather than an indifferent, dead and gone fact.
