it cannot be fixed by definite dates nor bounded by geographical outlines. In speaking of the Victorian era, Mrs. Ferguson spoke of a state of mind rather than a distinct period of history. "To the man in the street," she said, "Victorianism is just a word that is used to tag the individual whose mental and spiritual agility is not quite able to cope with the leavings of the modernists. It has grown into a misconstrued term meaning severe reproach, almost one of condemnation.

"I am inclined to think that after we have tried all our exciting experiments and explored our new freedoms, we shall return to that which carried her (the Victorian woman) through an infinity of frustrations, the Creed of Unselfishness. It may be we shall go back to truths that were to her eternal—That love is found only through relinquishment of self, and that homes are built of something more precious and more intangible than brick or stone."
