Miss Mauk Returns

WHEN Europe was beginning to feel the first shock of war in the early winter of 1914, Laura Mauk was on a ship headed toward Japan to take a teaching position.

She was graduated four years earlier from Kingfisher college, the records of which are now preserved at the University of Oklahoma. She had gone to Chicago to study for social service work. When she was offered the position of missionary and teacher, she told her relatives and friends in Dover, Oklahoma, good-bye and started on her great adventure.

That was a little more than twenty years ago. Laura Mauk came back to the United States and to Oklahoma during May on a year's leave before resuming her work at Tokyo. Another period of six years will elapse before another leave is due.

She is a small, almost frail little woman with patient brown eyes. She feels that after a score of years she is just beginning to catch the spirit of Japan and understand the character of its citizens, its students especially, for it is the university generation she contacts most frequently.

The troubles of Japan she carries heavily upon her shoulders because of her love and understanding of its people. The one solution for Japanese troubles, she believes, is the establishment of peace and prosperity in the East.

"Japan's situation is similar to England's. A large population is crowded into a comparatively small area. The people must depend upon manufacturing. China and India must be stabilized and prosperity brought to them before Japan will see better days.

"With stable governments and better conditions in these two large countries, Japan would have an extensive market for its goods. In turn, China, India and the other countries would enjoy better trade conditions for agricultural and mineral produce. That is the solution for Japan."

Miss Mauk, as well as many of her associates in Tokyo, is concerned about the spread of "Russian" communism to Japan. They feel that "Russian" communism would never be a solution for the nation's difficulties.

They are afraid that communism of the Russian variety would provide for the "doing away" with the older people, crippled children, the church and other institutions. In an address on the campus, Miss Mauk told of the fears of communism in both China and Japan.

Although she has been away from the United States during the war, the boom and the depression, she does not feel that she has missed much excitement.

"The floods, fires, earthquakes and famines keep Japan in an almost perpetual uproar. There is a saying that houses are built only to last three years since they are usually destroyed within that time.

"The tidal wave and the famine this year have caused unusual hardships, yet the Japanese people are brave in their distress. They are kind, too. I recall one incident that expresses the character of my students most clearly.

"During the bank moratorium in this country, one of my Japanese students read in the papers of the American banks closing. He came to me and offered to loan me half of the money he had just received from home if I needed it."

Hagy Is Honorary Colonel

Lawrence Hagy, 23as, Amarillo, Texas, has been appointed honorary lieutenant-colonel on the staff of Governor Allred of Texas.

Hagy, well known Texas oil man, is director of the West Texas chamber of commerce. He accompanied Governor Allred by airplane from Austin to Lubbock and thence by motor to Plainview for a Texas convention recently.

"I attribute the appointment to my R.O.T.C. training at the University of Oklahoma," the popular oil man commented.

Paul Crawford to Springfield

Paul Crawford, 34eng, has taken a position on the technical staff of the Central Illinois Public Service company and is stationed in Springfield, Illinois.

Crawford, a graduate in civil engineering, was employed by the government during the past winter on a lake project near Sayre. He accepted the position in Illinois early in June and immediately reported for service. He is the son of Sam S. Crawford, superintendent of the University Press. Paul is a member of the University chapter of Alpha Tau Omega.
