No Pension for Old Gym

torn out, then rebuilt. Its partitions have been moved about many times. It has depressing gray paint on some walls, while others are of a dark cream-colored hue. Some of the foundation bricks are tumbling. One floor-board in Carl Ritzman's speech clinic (which he also uses for an office and a classroom) is falling out. Many walls are of thin beaverboard, and when a class comes down the stairs the tread of feet sounds like a parade of elephants.

The Union Building with its commanding tower, its beautiful new pine room and lounges, cuts off light from the north, but luckily also protects "Kraettli Hall" from the cold north winds. Buchanan Hall on the south unfortunately cuts off ventilation in the summer.

Actually, there is no more danger of fire in the old building than in the usual frame residence, because it has steam heat and smoking is not allowed. However, it is a potentially serious fire hazard for the Union. In case fire should break out, the smoke would do irreparable damage to the white stonework of the Union as the two structures are only a few feet apart.

The old gym is distinctly a blot on the beauty of the campus as it is crowded so closely against the south end of the Union, and obviously its early removal was expected when the Union was built ten years ago.

Retirement of the old gym any time soon is now out of the question. Even though it looks like a barn and in cold figures couldn't be valued at more than $1,500 for its lumber, it has to be kept in service. For it's the only place available on the campus to house the speech department of the University—a rapidly growing and important department with a faculty of six persons, and the speech clinic which is doing valuable pioneer work in the correction of speech defects for Oklahomans.

O. U. hasn't yet had to pitch a tent on the campus to hold classes in, but it is actually only one step removed from that. A good strong tent might compare well with the old gym, at that!
