It's news when a taxpayer bites a tax collector, figuratively speaking, so William J. Crowe, '15-law, Oklahoma City attorney, got some headlines in the newspapers when he won an $8.33 judgment against the Oklahoma County auto tag agent. Crowe went into court to demand a refund of $8.33 he paid under protest when he purchased his 1938 car license tag. He protested paying 30 cents for penalty, 75 cents notary fee, and $7.28 excise tax on transfer of the car title. He got the penalty back because he had sought to purchase the tag before the deadline but the agent refused to issue the tag unless the excise tax was paid. As for the notary fee, he claimed he was not actually sworn and that no notary service actually was performed for him. The court upheld him on these grounds, but ruled the State Tax Commission's authority to appoint tag agents was not an issue in the suit.
