MANY Sooner alumni drive to Mexico City, but few bring back such excellent photographs as Raymond Tolbert, '12, '13law, Oklahoma City attorney who took the pictures shown on this page. Top left is a roadside scene between Taxco and Cuernavaca, snapped from a moving car.

"Many of the best pictures in Mexico may be secured in this way and a person planning the trip should perfect his technique with fast film and small aperture to insure proper depth of focus," Mr. Tolbert advises.

Upper right is a typical wayside scene taken from a moving automobile. Center right is a maguey field on the outskirts of Mexico City. Maguey, which Americans would call a variety of century plant, is extensively grown and is the source of pulque, the "poor man's beer," and other products.

Lower left is the patio of Acolman Monastery near the pyramids close to Mexico City, and lower right is the Pyramid of the Sun and other ruins.

"Going down," Mr. Tolbert cautions, "I missed a lot of good pictures because I did not know that if you stopped somebody and asked him to let you take his picture you were supposed to tip him. When I learned to observe this custom, I had much better results. I found the people uniformly courteous and cooperative."
