Alumni in the News

Gov. ROBERT S. KERR, '16, praised as a step forward for Oklahoma, the First National Clinic for Domestic Aviation Planning held recently in Oklahoma City and attended by top-flight aviation men from all over the country.

"I have never seen anything in Oklahoma that was more constructive to the general welfare and upbuilding of the state," the governor said. Following the clinic, he announced that he would back the teaching of aviation in the public schools of Oklahoma.

Among other alumni attending the clinic were Josh Lee, '17ba, member of the Civil Aeronautics Board and Carlene Roberts, '34fa, assistant to O. M. Mosier, vice president of American Airlines.

Mr. Lee reported on the Board's plans for postwar aerial "feeder" routes to serve small cities and marketing centers. Fiftynine applications are already on file with the Board in Washington, D. C., for postwar aviation service in Oklahoma, with four of them proposing routes that would serve Norman, Mr. Lee said.

About the helicopter for feeder airline service in Oklahoma, Mr. Lee guessed that "within two or three years from today, helicopters which carry 10 to 14 passengers will be available.'

Miss Roberts has charge of the American Airlines office in Washington while Mr. Mosier is in New York. Her job is to take care of the airlines' administrative and policy matters in the capitol, thereby keeping the various New York executives from having to spend so much time in Washington.

Heading the notables at the clinic, biggest of its kind ever held in this country, was Gill Robb Wilson, president of the National Aeronautic Association.

Asks Congressional Streamlining

Congressman Mike Monroney, '24ba, of Oklahoma, last month joined with Senator Francis Maloney of Connecticut to demand a streamlining of Congress.

They introduced a joint resolution in their respective houses calling for creation of a 12-man Congressional committee to 'recommend improvements in the organization of Congress."

Congressman Monroney suggested that the committee should look into the sprawling committee setup of the two houses, the relationship between the two houses with a view to consolidating hearings and preventing duplication of work, pay and size of the staff employed by both houses and the relationship between the Congress and the executive and judiciary.

Sentiment for streamlining Congress has been growing steadily with introduction of at least a dozen bills on the subject this year. The Monroney-Maloney resolution, however, represents the first time a senator and house member have joined hands on the issue.

Congressman Monroney has also proposed a 10 percent sales tax on purchases in excess of basic necessities to the House ways and means committee.

"This nation must have more tax revenue," Mr. Monroney declared. suggestion that we reduce expenditures by five billion dollars is a good one and welcome, but this should be accomplished, if possible, in addition to raising the required 10 to 11 billion dollars in additional taxes."
