"Greater access to the microphone and the telephone for both rural and city people will raise the cultural and educational level of the whole nation. It will also stimulate the flow of intelligence which is indispensable to successful democracy," was the statement of Commissioner Paul A. Walker, '12law, of the Federal Communications Commission, before the third annual meeting of the National Rural Electric Co-operative Association, January 16 in San Antonio, Texas. Mr. Walker added that if the telephone industry with all its resources cannot or will not provide rural telephone service promptly and at reasonable costs when materials and manpower become available, then the millions of farmers in America may well resort to their own collective efforts to secure it as they have secured electric service through the Rural Electrification Administration.
