Science at Work

THE SKELETON of a man who roamed the Oklahoma plains about 1,200 years ago bowed low as he welcomed the visitors to the new University Anthropology Museum in the basement of Monnet Hall, next door to the government department. Grinning grotesquely, this Very Early Sooner first exhibited the showcases of pipes, arrows and bags from Colombia, South America.

He trilled a few notes on a Caddo flute as he passed the cases of Indian costumes, jewelry and other objects, valued at $15,000. The papoose cradle in which five of Osage Chief Bacon Rind's children were carried adds a homey touch to this corner.

Mr. V. E. Sooner explained that Dr. J. Willis Stovall, director, Ralph B. Shead, artist and technician, and Dr. Lloyd H. Stow, professor of classical languages, during the last seven months had built display cases, painted the three rooms which the museum occupies, selected items for display and arranged and labeled the material.

Idly popping his knuckles, our guide strolled over to the ceramic pottery, representing some of the finest examples of aborigine pottery-making, and indicated with pride more than 4,000 pieces found buried in McCurtain County.

He really outdid himself telling of the Spiro Mound exhibit, however, since the objects dug from these mounds reveal all we know of his people. There are pots and bones, jewelry, shells, masks, knives and pipes used in everyday and ceremonial life 800 to 1,200 years ago. And to add to the aborigine atmosphere, an elaborate model depicting a funeral ceremony with human sacrifices conducted in the temple has been prepared. Worth $10,000, the model contains 98 individual figures. The costumes, architecture and art have been authentically reconstructed from the data gathered during the three-year excavation of the site in LeFlore County.

Explaining that some of the objects didn't belong to his time, Mr. V. E. Sooner faithfully took us through the Classical Room to show us the money, statues and domestic articles of ancient Greece and Rome. Of special interest is the Roman mortuary urn which is supposed to contain tears of the deceased or his loved ones in the rim. The urn is of clear glass and liquid can be seen within the rim.

At this point, Dr. Stovall, cigar in hand, entered the room. His duties as guide finished, Mr.

V. E. Sooner gave us a toothy grin and slipped into the showcase on the left side of the door, and stretched out as he was laid to rest years ago and later found in the Spiro Mound.

Dr. Stovall, after asking if we had seen the new museum, outlined his hopes for a University of Oklahoma Museum that would be a credit to the state. He declared that not many people know that the value of objects of art, history and natural history now poorly shown or inadequately housed on the campus exceeds $2,000,000.

The building, as approved by the University Board of Regents, would house many of the collections now scattered and stored in various buildings at O. U. in addition to others. Collections in the new Anthropology Museum which we just toured would be included.

In the main entrance there would be a foyer containing a Foucault's pendulum, demonstrating the rotation of the earth. In the Great Hall, would be fully mounted great dinosaurs that once roamed Oklahoma's jungles.

Exhibits of rocks, minerals, plants, invertebrates and vertebrates, all of which trace organic development in the animal kingdom, are planned.

American Indian exhibits would be the dominant feature on another floor, along with Oklahoma and Southwestern historical objects.

The proximity of a strong Mexican culture suggests a Mexican room containing examples of Mexican objects of history and art. There might also be a South American room since many students in the University have a deep interest in the region south of the Rio Grande.

In the basement, there should be room for a seismograph, to record earthquakes, and adequate storage and work space. According to the plans, the building will be constructed around a patio with walls of Mayan and Aztec architecture, enclosing a fossil wood garden and a cactus garden. The patio will also contain space for temporary exhibits that might include a Pawnee earth lodge, Ponca tepee, a log cabin of the type occupied alike by Indians, whites and Negroes in the early days.

Dr. Stovall said the Museum Committee would welcome any articles that servicemen might send back from their stations. He would like cultural examples from every island a Sooner has touched in the South Pacific. Such gifts from either the European or Pacific battlefields are permissible and would have no trouble passing the customs, he stated.—ELIZABETH LEES.
