He served in India from July, 1943, until June, 1944, as special representative of the Board of Economic Warfare and the Foreign Economic Administration, handling various programs involving lend-lease, the purchasing of strategic materials, air transport and economic intelligence.

In the article, Mr. Fischer describes the terrible living conditions, disease and mass deaths from starvation he witnessed in the over-populated country. He concludes there will be no answer for the British for India's economic problem, that British rule in India is not likely to survive much longer because of the "failure to face up to the essential tasks of government."

He also discusses the Bombay Plan of industrialization plus increased agricultural production, sponsored by the Indian Nationalists, and the program of Nehru, leader of the left wing of the Indian National Congress. Mr. Fischer says the essential thing which these programs leave out, and he considers this an important item in tackling the Indian problem, is the "injection from outside India of a tremendous stream of equipment and capital and technical skill."

He concluded, "Incalculable amounts of money and energy would have to be poured out, first of all, on a campaign of education and public health in the thousands of Indian villages. Such a campaign in the very long run might bring the birth rate under control, clean up the malaria and cholera and typhoid, and prepare the Indian people physically and mentally to remake their own destiny. On top of that, more billions would be needed to get a modern industry under way on a scale capable of filling the needs of 400 million people."
