President Speaks

The general objective of the research is to procure information which may lead to a greater production of fishes in all Oklahoma lakes and which may be applied even to obtain a greater yield in farm fish ponds. The entire project is, of course, educational and one of the most important benefits will be the training and education of young men to carry out Oklahoma's wildlife research and management programs in the years ahead.

When the laboratory is completed the program can, of course, be expanded greatly, for it will be possible then to have research equipment and personnel on the shore of the lake which is available now only on the Norman campus.

Looking to the future, many problems are being lined up for investigation. Some of our biologists interested in human parasites, especially those which transmit malaria, are planning studies of malaria at the Lake Texoma area with reference to hazards to fishermen and methods of control of malarial outbreaks.

Other of our scientists are interested in the commercial possibility of using rough fish. Some work has already been done in methods of using rough fish for table use—fresh, canned, pickled, smoked and dried. Other studies involve the use of rough fish such as shad, carp, gar, etc., as fertilizer, as fish meal for stock food and even as food for pets. Enough information is now available to indicate that rough fish in Lake Texoma might provide the basis for a small industrial development and such development would, of course, be favorable to Oklahoma fishermen, for the taking of the rough fish from our lakes would make it possible for the game fish to develop in greater abundance.

Another project that will receive attention is the effects of climatic factors such as wind direction, barometric pressure, humidity, moon phases, etc., on fishing. That such climatic factors do affect the success of fishermen is rather generally admitted, but very little is known as to why and how these factors exert their effects.

The information obtained from the investigations now being conducted and planned for the future on Lake Texoma will be made available to the public in various ways—through publication in scientific journals; through publications of bulletins and pamphlets for distribution to those interested; and by the conduction of short courses on lake management, especially short courses on farm pond management. When the new laboratory is completed, facilities on the shore of the lake will be available for these short courses.

It is conceivable that the development of the new Biological Laboratory on the shores of Lake Texoma may be one of the most far reaching and significant educational developments in recent years. Certainly the project illustrates how a generous gift supplemented by State funds can lead to benefits far beyond those anticipated by the giver.
