Rader . . .

his Currier and Ives items line the walls of his office. And he's proud of a pre-French Revolution woodcut print retouched in colors by hand. It hangs on his office wall. "Traded a fellow a book for that print," he recalls.

Rader ranks near the top of the roster of persons who have been with the University the greatest number of years. "I was working as a student mail carrier in 1904 when an opening occurred in the University library," he remembers. "I applied for the job as a student assistant, and I've been with the library ever since."

"The library was housed in the second administration building which had been built after the original one was destroyed by fire. There weren't many more books in it than there are right here in my office."

Rader moved with the library when the Carnegie Library building was built on the North Oval. When the stock of books outgrew its stacks in 1928, he packed up the library and moved to the building which later became the Art Museum. "In 1928 I informed Dr. Bizzell that the building was

The Poll was Stopped

University students—480 strong—voted six to one for repeal of state prohibition laws during a test ballot sponsored on the campus by the Oklahoma Campus Temperance Association. The poll—originally planned for two or three days—was stopped after the first day with the announcement by the group's state president, Harlan Mendenhall, '37ba, Oklahoma City, that "we have learned what we were interested in finding out. We will spend six weeks during February and March conducting an education campaign. Talks will be scheduled at various times and places on the campus. Speakers will be sent to fraternity and sorority houses." The tabulation of the one day's votes showed 414 students favoring repeal and 66 standing with state prohibition. Tabulation of the ballots showed that fraternity members were wetter than independent students.

J. D. "Dub" Wheeler, '30-'36, first All-American NEA selection, returned to the campus following participation in the East-West game. He announced he would continue work toward a degree and steer clear of professional football. Recently Wheeler was named superintendent of the State Training School for boys at Stringtown.

Lois Haskell Straight, '35Law, Bartlesville attorney, scored the highest average when 27 new lawyers took the bar examination and were admitted to practice in Oklahoma in January 1936. She was the only woman taking the examination.

John Runyan, '31-'37, Oklahoma City, editor of the Covered Wagon, was listed as one of the college editors of College Humor, national magazine which was revived after being suspended for several years.
