What Will She Do for a Date?

As in every other U. S. community, the Formosan problem has affected campus thinking. Student author tells how.

By LARRY LEVIEUX, 55

A COLLEGE SEMESTER is a unique phenomenon. Throughout a period of about four months, the daily routine of classes, football games and studying goes on, with pressure steadily mounting. The three-week interval after the Christmas holidays is the big push. Social doings come to a halt. Term papers are due, and the "sweating-out" of finals begins in earnest. Tension increases until suddenly the last paragraph of the last examination is finished, and all is over. Then, the grade reports come in. A fresh start is ahead.

Many students begin a new semester with resolutions of doing better. The first week, Susie makes all her classes on time, doesn't cut, studies every day to keep up with assignments, and doesn't waste time. It lasts one week. After that, the old habits of procrastination are back. A couple of weeks of character-building are about all that most of us can manage. Now, the second semester is well underway and the pressure is on again.

The enrolment procedure was simplified this term for those of us who tire of getting writer's cramp signing our name over and over again. The old packet with blanks for all sorts of repetitious information has been replaced by a streamlined packet of eight cards. The Registrar's office promises even more simplification with a three-card system for next year. The future looks bright, indeed. The sectioning jam, however, is still with us. The lines were just as long, and the students just as disgruntled after a few hours in the "lineup."

What grades Johnny made last semester, and what courses Jeannie is enrolled in this semester are the topics of current coffee conversation. Even the critical Formosan situation takes a back seat to these issues.

And speaking of world events, it is interesting to observe student reactions to world crises. Most of us are aware of the seriousness of international tension and the complications awaiting each of us when we leave the "ivy-covered walls," but there is a light-hearted attitude toward them just the same.

One freshman girl expressed her view of the Formosan crisis this way: "I hope we don't go to war. If all the boys have to go into service, who will be here for us to date?" Her comment was made with a smile, and I know her concern is deeper than that, but the attitude is typical. We'll worry about it tomorrow.

The graduating seniors receiving commissions seem to think little about the possibility of their being in a foxhole a few months hence. It shouldn't be called superficiality, though. My name for it would be inevitability. There is a time and a place for everything, so they say, and books and football are filling the spot very nicely right now.

The between-semester skiing bug is spreading more each year. A trip to Aspen, Colorado, or one of the other Rocky Mountain winter resort areas for a week of skiing is supposed to be a tonic to shattered nerves. Judging by the number of arms and legs in casts, however, one might think more bones were shattered than nerves calmed. The ever-growing interest in the winter sports is creating a problem for the ski enthusiasts from our prairie states. Perhaps popular demand will someday bring the mountains to Oklahoma.

A new service to students is the introduction of a voluntary health insurance plan sponsored by the Student Senate. Low-cost policies could be purchased during enrolment, insuring against hospitalization, medical expenses, surgical fees and other health costs during the semester. The new plan received more interest than even the Senate had hoped for.

Fifty-nine R.O.T.C. cadets and midshipmen from all three services were commissioned at the mid-year commissioning exercises. After Rear Adm. Wendell G. Switzer had made an address, the 59 had shiny gold bars pinned to their collars by mothers, wives and sweethearts.

a feat—they climbed from 18,000 feet to 21,000 and back in one day over a very difficult route.

The next day when it became clear that no agreement could be reached as to the proper route on the south peak Dick and I descended to the 18,000-foot camp. Graham wanted to stay another day to make the third ascent of the West Peak. Late the next afternoon he joined us. By now we had all been at this camp so long we were beginning to get shell-shocked. If someone rustled a sleeping bag, the cry of "Avalanche!" would be heard and three people would try to get out of the tent door simultaneously.

We were grateful to get back to base camp the next night. The ascent of the two peaks of Huandoy completed our objectives in the Yanganuco so we sent two porters down to Yungay to get burros to bring all our food and equipment out of the mountains.

On the night of August 5 we were all back in civilization after 48 days in the Andes. We still wanted to try the two peaks of Huascaran. Although both had been climbed three times, they were still worthwhile objectives.

On August 8 the seven of us and our porters carried loads to establish the next camp which would be halfway to the great saddle between the two peaks of Huascaran.

At about this point things began to get complicated. A party of Peruvian climbers joined us and set up their camp about 100 yards from ours. This was the same group that had climbed the South Peak in 1953, using the route found by Mexicans. On descent the Mexicans had left a fixed rope over a particularly difficult ice wall and it was this that allowed the Peruvians to make the ascent four days after the Mexicans. They were opportunists of the first order.

Clearly they hoped to do the same again, only this time they were interested in the North Peak. They figured to follow our route, if we found one, and benefit from our steps and fixed ropes. Late in the morning of the 10th, three of us left, followed by the Peruvians. After some excellent ice work by George, we reached a point only a few hundred feet below the saddle. It was high enough to see that there were no further difficulties.

We pushed upwards the next day. After spending several hours in a zig-zag route in the first 1,000 feet above the saddle, we finally broke out on the broad slope leading to the summit. We were now beginning to feel the effects of the altitude. The breakable crust was exasperating. The slope seemed interminable. When I meas-

Since I had climbed Pisco in 1952, the East Peak now attracted my interest. On the next day the other six started out for Pisco while Georgia and I tried the East Peak. Trying the spur which leads to the north ridge, we ran into difficulty almost immediately with the snow and ice plastered rock. After some difficult climbing, we topped the steep portion of the spur. But by now it was too late—to continue meant a bivouac for which neither of us was very eager. So we roped off the ridge and were soon back at camp. The others had already returned from Pisco.

At Base Camp two days were consumed in pre-packaging food and sorting equipment for the attempt on Chopicalqui. In 1932 the Austrians made the first and only ascent of this peak, at 20,997 feet the fifth highest in Peru, by the west ridge. He hoped to be able to repeat this climb. Our plan was to establish two camps on the way to a high camp at an 18,600 feet col from which we could reach the summit in one day.

We may have set a record that day in that all eight of us reached the 21,000 feet summit. When the mists temporarily cleared we could see nearly the entire range from Huantsan to the south to Nevado Santa Cruz to the north. In a jubilant mood we descended.

Now we had only two objectives left in the Yanganuco: the Huandoy group and the incredible Chacaraju. It was not clear in what direction our efforts should be directed inasmuch as we had not seen anything that looked much like a route on either peak. After some serious discussion the next day it was decided to split up into two groups and reconnoiter both possibilities. I was in the group that was to investigate the possibilities of Huandoy. Our unanimous decision was that there was no even moderately safe route due to avalanche danger.

We arrived back at Base Camp a day earlier than the Chacaraju reconnaissance party. The next afternoon we learned that they had even less luck than we. They found no feasible route. Chacaraju comes uncomfortably close to the "unclimbable" class. Gloom surrounded our discussions at the campfire that night. John Oberlin's vacation time had run out and he started his return trip to the U. S. the next day.

More in desperation than anything else, George, Graham, Georgia, and I decided to have at least a look at the left hand side of the east approach to the Huandoy saddle. On July 21, we left for Advance Base with our porters.

Early in the afternoon of the 27th, after some hard climbing and excellent teamwork, the saddle was reached without incident. Following a lengthy breakfast the next morning, we peered out of our tents—there was the everpresent wind together with cloud and light snow. The other two decided to wait another day before trying the peaks.

However, not wanting to waste the day, I thought I would go up and finish kicking steps to the high col in preparation for the climb the next day. As I neared the col, the snow became even worse than before, being a breakable crust with knee-deep powder beneath. Before too long I was on the col looking down 6,600 feet to the beautiful Lake Parron. Looking up at the West Peak (20,856 feet) I could see that it was a straightforward matter of chopping steps up a steep snow face. The thought then occurred to me to kick and chop steps toward the summit until I tired, thus making things easier for the next day. Somewhat to my surprise a couple of hours later, I found myself at the summit. It was almost a mathematical point of snow with a fearsome view down the sheer north face. The descent was made without difficulty.

Up the next morning at 9:30 a.m., we were astonished to see Fred, Cres, and Georgia arriving from below. They had decided to join us and climb the north peak in one day, one long day. It was quite
