John Newby: DuPont Engineer

Marketing a new product is an expensive, complicated process. For example, such products of Du Pont de Nemours & Co. usually originate in their annual $50,000,000 research fund. Then, before the items go into production, a certain amount of process design is necessary. Often the assignment for such design goes to John A. Newby, '12-'15.

Newby has been a DuPont engineer since 1941. He joined the company in Pryor and in subsequent years was handed assignments which took him to 17 different states and two foreign countries. At present he is with DuPont's plants in Wilmington, Delaware.

Newby entered O.U. one year after he moved to Norman in 1907. Following four years in the University's Preparatory Department, he enrolled in the College of Engineering. During his first year as a mechanical engineering major he began putting together his own automobile.

"I built the frame," he said, "then secured axles, wheels, gears and engine from various sources. Missing or broken parts I made myself, and assembled it all in a chassis. Then I built a sport roadster body on it, and it ran."

After graduation he worked for the Magnolia Company for 22 years, becoming Construction Superintendent of the Oklahoma district. He left the firm to work as engineer on a large flood control dam on the North Canadian river at Canton. A year later he was with DuPont.

The company has since given him a series of tasks touching on practically everything from insecticides to dynamite, Dacron fibre to special atomic bomb projects. One of the most unusual problems he has helped solve was that concerning the making of a strong, highly pure hydrogen peroxide. Since no steel could be used in its production, all the equipment had to be made almost entirely of glass, ceramics, plastics, quartz and platinum.

What spare time Newby can find he devotes to hobbies which sound almost as much like work as his job: landscaping and fine cabinet work. He's a golfer and photographer, too, and he does fraternal work in Masonic bodies.

He and Mrs. Newby (the former Maude Proffitt of Norman) celebrated their 40th wedding anniversary this year. They have a son, a foster son and five grandchildren. A foster daughter is deceased.
