think of a dub who'd shoot his own arm off?" He never let the loss of the arm hinder him: his finest teams came after 1907, and today, at age 81, he is as bright-eyed and active as a man could wish to be.

Oklahoma lost to Kansas, 15-0.

Then the team lost Harry Hughes, its fiercest fullback, due to the 12-hour eligibility ruling. Days later, on the way to Austin for a game against Texas, the team was in a train wreck. Fortunately no one was injured. At the game itself one of Oklahoma's best guards was undeservedly expelled because the referee thought he was slugging.

"The decision was so palpably wrong," wrote Keith, "that for the first time in his three-year coaching stint at Norman, Owen went on the field to protest. With eloquent gestures of his left arm, the Oklahoma coach was trying to explain the situation to the official who had ruled (the guard) out. However from the uninterested look on the referee's face Owen saw that his remonstrations were having no effect. Then one of the Texas players told Owen the official was the coach of the nearby Texas School for the Deaf, and was himself deaf and dumb. This was frustration to which there could be no appeal. Owen didn't argue further with the deaf man, but turning on his heel walked back very fast to the varsity bench and sat down. Varsity players of the era still chuckle over the incident, maintaining it was the only time in their lives they ever saw an expression of utter helplessness in Owen's usually cheerful face."

Texas won, 29-10.

On the eve of one of the games that season, students attempted to hold their usual shirttail parade in downtown Norman. A nightwatchman, not realizing that the
