EDUCATION PROBLEMS

It is not the contention here that a general education will answer such a call to duty and provides solutions for our institutional ailments, but it is evident that "specialization" alone will not do it. Here is definitely a problem of teaching all college students the necessity of understanding the threat to our standards of civilization. No names are mentioned, no insinuations are made but this bold statement should arouse the minds of those who are charged with the responsibility of curriculum studies and proposed changes. Such warnings are not isolated cases; they are all too prevalent. How soon teaching can be done to prepare students for this "reformation" is a question that will not wait a score of years for an answer. . . .

IN THE PROCESS of reconverting from a war to a peacetime schedule, Yale University, in 1946, introduced four new programs of study. A summer reading program became an integral part of the regular curriculum with regular examinations at the end of each vacation. New programs in the fields of Far Eastern and Russian studies are offered for the first time at the undergraduate level. The "intensive" method of language study is used in the language courses. The fourth field is "American Civilization" for both undergraduates and graduates. This program cuts across departmental lines.

West Virginia University instituted in the school year 1948-49 a complete program of Integrated Studies. . . . This program, which is optional, is designed for lower division courses and consists of four introductory general courses: Humanities, social sciences, biological sciences and physical sciences. Completion of two years' work in the four fields qualifies the student for the degree of associate in arts. Arrangements can be made whereby one major course may be started in the freshman year and at the end of four years the baccalaureate degree may be obtained.

It is generally observed that in practically every college or university where a program of general education is instituted several common problems and points for consideration arise. Of course not every institution of higher learning has all these problems, but they are general and must be met.

Directing a large number of students' efforts only in specialized fields prohibits the development of "intercultural understanding." This means, in part, that courses of wider interest, coupled with an appeal to maintain sustained interest, must be added or integrated with material already offered in courses. The latter is more economical if teachers who are capable of seeing the whole scope of learning can be found or trained for this task. Finding such teachers today is virtually an admitted impossibility. There remains then the problem of modifying the curricula by both subtraction and addition with the hope, which must be realized, that teachers will be trained in the future to perform the task of administering a general education.
