Sylvan Cromer Steps Up

Sylvan J. Cromer, formerly of Marshall, Oklahoma, now serves Union Carbide of New York.

FOR SYLVAN J. CROMER, '30eng, '37m. eng, there seems to be no direction other than straight up. His latest step in that direction came November 1; he was appointed a vice president of the Union Carbide Company of New York City.

Cromer, who lives with his family in Chappaqua, New York, is in charge of engineering development for industrial use for Union Carbide.

He's come a long way since Marshall, Oklahoma — his birthplace — and the University of Oklahoma.

Following receipt of his master's degree in mechanical engineering in 1937, he taught for a time in the University's College of Engineering. Later he taught at Louisiana State University, then became research supervisor for Columbia University's division of war research.

In the early forties Cromer went to Oak Ridge, Tennessee, to work as assistant superintendent of the engineering development division at the Gaseous

Diffusion Plant there. In short order he was superintendent.

Then he switched to the post of chief engineer in charge of process design on new multimillion-dollar plants going up at Paducah, Kentucky, and Portsmouth, Ohio. He served in the same capacity when the Oak Ridge plant was expanded.

Soon after, he joined the Works Laboratory, one of the largest research installations in the world. He had a dual capacity there—responsibility for operation of the laboratory, and for engineering development and applied research. Many divisions were concerned with problems of nuclear propulsion of aircraft and the building and testing of reactors, and it was Cromer's job to coordinate these divisions.

In 1955 he was honored with the Richards Memorial Award for outstanding achievement in mechanical engineering. He holds two U. S. patents and is author of several technical papers.
