Lt. Rex D. Howerton is shown behind the controls of his F-106, the world's fastest jet.

Sooner Flies Fastest Jet

A Sooner alumnus, Lt. Rex D. Howerton, '53, is the man at the controls of the world's fastest jet aircraft—a plane which reaches speeds over 1,500 miles per hour.

As a member of the 456th Fighter Interceptor Squadron, stationed at Castle Air Force Base, California, Howerton is piloting the F-106, the delta-winged fighter designed to intercept and destroy invading enemy aircraft.

The F-106 is part of the North American Air Defense Command and can carry out its mission in any kind of weather from ground level to well above 50,000 feet. The single-place aircraft has an electronic guidance and missile firing system to free the pilot from manual flying, if necessary, to allow him to concentrate on his job of monitoring and controlling the complex components of the aircraft.

Howerton and his fellow squadron members have one mission: to be ready at any time, in any weather, to take off and intercept unknown or enemy aircraft, and, if necessary, to destroy them. The armament carried by the F-106 consists of Falcon guided missiles. The aircraft also has a combat capability of carrying the tremendously destructive Genie atomic rocket.

With an official world's speed record of 1,525.95 miles per hour, the F-106 is over 70 feet from tip to tail and 20 feet tall, weighs approximately 33,000 pounds, and is the Air Force's newest and most powerful air defense weapon.
