Nearly everyone has an opinion on Sooner football chances in 1962, but among those best qualified to speak out on college football are those who actually saw action on the field. To open the season, we called on five former Big Red team members to comment on the value of the sport. Their answers, from taped telephone interviews, appear in the Roll Call section.

As a former Big Red team member, how do you feel about college football?

JIM LAWRENCE, '59bus
Lawrence Department Store
Cordell

LAWRENCE—I think college football is getting better every year. Competition is getting stiffer, and I personally don't believe that there will be any more long winning streaks like the University of Oklahoma has had in the past. Of course my being an ex-Ouer, I'd like to see them start another winning streak, but the coaching and the playing are all getting better every year . . . I think that an athlete of any kind—not just a football player—learns a lot on the athletic field that can't be taught in books and in the classroom. There's no better place to learn how to cope with your competition than on the football field or the basketball court or in any type of athletics. Now on the football field, you have a lot of competition to make the team, the same way you have competition in business. I'm in business here now, and I have a lot of competitors, and you learn on the football field to be competitive and to try to beat your competitor. The same applies in business . . . The memories of my football playing are among the greatest that I have, and if I had it to do over, I'd do it just exactly as I did before—except I would wish we could beat Notre Dame and Texas . . . I hadn't traveled too extensively before playing down there, and, of course, we didn't travel a whole lot, but we made some nice trips to the Orange Bowl and to Notre Dame and Pittsburgh, and you get to see the country and meet people from other sections of the country. It helps your personality and helps you learn to get along with all types of people . . . I played in the alumni game this year, and they have some pretty tough kids down there. Of course, they're not too experienced, but they have that old desire to win, and they were really out there hitting. I think that if they practice hard and barring key injuries, O.U.'ll have a real good ball team this fall. I'm sure banking on it.

As a former Big Red team member, how do you feel about college football?

ORVILLE MATHEWS, '42ed
Tinker Air Force Base
Midwest City

MATHEWS—College football is almost a necessity. It has a lot of advantages. In the first place, it builds character in many of the boys. Very seldom do you see a college graduate—a football player—who is in any sort of trouble. In addition, it gives many boys an opportunity for an education who wouldn't have had one otherwise. I was one of those who probably never would have gone to college if it hadn't been for football . . . In most cases, now that you have air travel and such as that, the boys aren't out of class any appreciable length of time, and then the practice sessions aren't too lengthy to interfere with studies. Normally the difficulty with football, so far as academic work is concerned, is working out hard for a couple of hours with the possibility that you're a little bit tired to study as hard as you might at night . . . Of course, I'm still in the field of physical education, you might say, as recreation director here at Tinker Air Force Base, and so football fits right in with the type of work I'm in . . . I wouldn't say that we gained anything in particular from the trips in my case. Some of the boys now possibly see some of the country that they might not otherwise see, but of course my time was before World War II, and getting involved in the war, we had a lot of travel that extended quite a bit beyond football trips . . . I was married for three years during my college days, and I believe my wife was glad I was playing football.

ARNOLD—I think college football is invaluable. I don't see that anyone could question its value. The competitive standpoint is probably one of its biggest values—working with other people, team work and that type of thing. Physical conditioning, of course, is one of its main assets, although I don't think enough people play football to help nationally too much from that standpoint. But for the ones who do, it's a big help . . . There were a couple of years that I didn't play football in college. I don't feel that I made any better grades when I wasn't playing football than when I was. I felt I had all the time to do the work I needed to do whether I was playing or not . . . Football has made contacts for me and acquainted me with a lot of people I wouldn't have known otherwise . . . The travel is nice since many boys of that age haven't had much opportunity to travel, you know. Travel is good for people . . . This year it looks to me as if the team is on the way back.

As a former Big Red team member, how do you feel about college football?

JOE RECTOR, '60ed coach, West Texas State Canyon, Texas

RECTOR—I know there are a lot of comments against college football, but since I have played it and gone to school, I would definitely say there is a place for football in our educational system. I don't think it is too time consuming. When a boy participates in college football, he budgets his time better. I think he does better in his school work during football season than out of season. Because I'm coaching football now, I'd have to say football definitely has helped me, since I would not have been able to get a coaching job had I not played football in college; I wouldn't have had the experience . . . On the football trips we went to many places that I would not have been able to see had I not been in football. You know, places such as Notre Dame at South Bend, Pittsburgh, Miami, all those places. I was married my senior year, and my wife enjoyed the football. When we went to Miami, she was able to go along with the squad's other married folks . . . She never said anything against my playing football . . . I hope the team will be improved this year, and I think they will be because I understand they had a real good spring practice and beat the alumni. I'm sure they'll do better than their 5-5 season of last year.

As a former Big Red team member, how do you feel about college football?

DR. CHET BYNUM, '53bs, '57med doctor
Farmington, New Mexico

BYNUM—Of course I think a great deal of college football. It's really wonderful that so many fellows are able to get their college educations who otherwise might not be able to . . . In association with football, and especially football at Oklahoma, there are so many things that you learn that otherwise I'm sure would be missed. It didn't give me a lot of free time, of course. I took pre-med and got through, and a lot of the boys took more difficult courses than that, I'm sure. It just depends on what you want . . . You learn to be under a little pressure, an advantage that the average student probably doesn't have. It's good experience when you face things later on, when you're out of school and on your own . . . The football trips were relatively short other than the bowl games, and there wasn't really much time; but the bowl games were really wonderful . . . From all I understand, we're going to do real well this year, and I think so far as the record is concerned, we'll be better than the last two years. We're building up, and I think next year we'll have a great team, like before. That's just a guess, but we'll be rooting for them all the way.
