Almost everyone who has been to college remembers a favorite course he took or regrets not taking a course that would have been valuable to him later on. The Sooner Magazine was interested in knowing what some of these "most valuable" courses are and why various alumni would recommend them to others. The answers of five such alumni, taken from telephone interviews, appear on the following pages of the Roll Call section.

What college course do you feel is the most valuable for all students to take?

J. CLAUDE MONNET, '20ba, '22Law
attorney
Oklahoma City

MONNET—Well, the most valuable course I took and the one that I think would be the most valuable for all to take would be entirely different. I didn't take the one that I think every student ought to take—a course in accounting . . . In any kind of business, whether you're a lawyer or a doctor or whatever you are, or in your private life, accounting is valuable to you . . . Perhaps the law school now requires this in pre-law; I don't know. They didn't when I was there. It was an elective, but I just didn't happen to take it. I started out to be either a doctor or a lawyer, and I specialized in the sciences along with history and Latin and some things that I guess they don't take very much any more . . . Basic accounting certainly should be required for all lawyers. Somebody has evidently told them because we find that most of the young lawyers applying for positions now have had at least basic accounting and some of them a good deal more than the basic course . . . I think accounting is needed in anything you do nowadays. You need a knowledge of accounting so you can keep books, understand the balance sheets when you read them and know what they mean. This is valuable in almost any business there is . . . I don't know whether it ought to be a requirement or not. The people who are planning the curriculum are more familiar with the needs than I am. But students should at least be encouraged to take accounting.

What college course do you feel is the most valuable for all students to take?

JAMES R. WILLIS, '58eng
Blackwell Zinc Company plant engineer
Blackwell

WILLIS—At the present time, in my opinion, colleges should offer more courses in the background and the workings of our government. This is a subject that is most interesting to me now and something I wish I had a better background in . . . After you get out of college, start working and taking an active part in civic affairs and the other community affairs, you need to have a better understanding of what goes on around you every day. You should understand just how this government has given us what we have today. This allows us to have a better insight as to why we should protect these privileges that we have. Basically, if more people had this background, they would take a more active interest—and this is a fault in people today: they don't take an interest . . . I took the minimum in college. I took either a three-hour or five-hour course in government at Northern Oklahoma Junior College at Tonkawa and picked up some government in history courses at the University. Well, I suppose I had the ordinary "take it for granted" attitude, and this was wrong on my part. I can look back now and see that I should have dug into it more . . . More emphasis should be placed on government and history—they go hand in hand. If I were putting down a second choice, history should be taught along with government. They should offer more in both of these areas . . . I think more engineers should take these courses. But I don't limit this to engineering. I would apply it to all fields. Regardless of what we do when we get out, we all should be active in the affairs of our community and of our nation.

What college course do you
feel is the most valuable
for all students to take?

MRS. JACK L. PARSONS
(Vivian Knox, '35ba)
Claremont, California

MRS. PARSONS—Grammar and English . . . because so many students miss out on this. You use your language every day, and a person who makes grammatical errors in his use of language is typed as being ignorant. Everyone who is weak in this area should take refresher courses . . . More stress should be put on oral compositions and English. Housewives have to get up at P-TA meetings, and if they don't feel sure of themselves because they don't know how to speak properly, they aren't able to help themselves or their communities or their children. I wrote my thesis on oral composition. Because of a good background and training in English and its composition, I haven't been afraid to express myself at public meetings, such as school board meetings or at P-TA. I have many friends who have remarked that they don't feel capable of expressing themselves . . . I was convinced of the value of English when I was in college . . . I think where we really miss the boat is in high school. My daughter, who is in high school, has had very little grammar. We start too soon to study writing themes without any background. It is like building a house without first putting in the foundation. I think grammar is just not being given enough importance in high schools. I think it is required in most colleges but should be stressed more . . . More basic grammar should be required. The old-fashioned diagramming method is one of the best ways to teach it. If the students can't pass it, they should be required to take it over.

Conversation Piece

What college course do you
feel is the most valuable
for all students to take?

MRS. CARL C. COLLIER
(Patricia McLean, '52ed)
Norman

MRS. COLLIER—Of all the courses I had, I would consider English one of the most important because it's more in the field of communications . . . I took some English but not as much as I would have liked to have taken. Now, when I say English, this includes literature as well as the basic English composition courses . . . English is the part of the college class work that is used every day in all types of work, whatever the occupation—and at home as well . . . I just feel that in getting along with other people in conversation, in understanding people, you have to express yourself so that you know what other people mean and so that they understand you. Part of this comes from English courses. . . I wasn't convinced that English would be this much help when I took it in college . . . English is a course every student should take. Most of the students in arts and sciences get enough English. However students in more specialized fields usually don't get enough. English isn't a specialized field in itself; no matter what job you have, you still have to talk to other people. . . English courses should either be increased in high school or in the amount of English taken in college. The more specialized fields often have only the requirement of first-year English; more should be required . . . I took what was required. I have often wished that I had taken more.
